Digital Camera and Viewing Lenses The camera used to capture an image as well as the viewfinder or the digital display on the back of the camera are vital to capturing the perfect image. A good viewfinder gives you information about the image in your viewfinder and also makes it easy to see the true exposure values. A digital display is important for viewing the image on a screen of some kind and adjusting the image's brightness and contrast. The basic camera settings can be adjusted easily and intuitively, but what will you use to view the images you take? Your camera may come with various attachments or viewing screens. Do you like viewfinders or screens? Most cameras come with a viewfinder, called an optical viewfinder, that is connected to the camera via a small cable. With optical viewfinders, you look through the lens and see the image on the light-sensitive film. You can tilt the viewfinder up or down to see more or

Hurricanes face endless challenges to survive in Florida's Atlantic. But you can help these adorable residents find homes, even if it means overcoming a seaside opponent. A new program by the National Wildlife Federation is available to help homeowners and businesses protect native wildlife in their backyards. The Herald-Tribune reports that if your yard does not fit the new size requirements, you can still "sign up" for a "Get a Gator!" membership that will help protect vulnerable wild animals in your community. The program, starting in Miami-Dade County, will have a team of people who monitor designated lands and issue tickets to people who violate the new wildlife rules. In the program's first year, an estimated 300 pigs, birds and snakes will be relocated to areas where it's more appropriate for them to be. If there are large enough populations, the FWC can also begin to remove the nuisance animals from the wild. The policy change marks a new phase for wildlife managers on the front lines against nuisance wildlife. According to the National Wildlife Federation's website, it's estimated that about 1 in 10 Americans has an interaction with a wild animal, such as a snake on the pathway or a pig in the yard. Each year, the FWC creates a list of species that are invasive or are a real nuisance in the community. In the most recent round of updates, the list included alligators, white ibis, New World pigs, Burmese pythons, northern map turtles, shorebirds and spiny-cheeked bats. According to the Miami Herald, Miami-Dade has a long history of feral pigs and raccoons. In 2009, the FWC received a report about a tenacious raccoon that officials believe was illegally feeding on a sport fish in the Everglades. The animal, dubbed "the raccoon taxicab," escaped from its owner, rode a skateboard to a Dade County lake and swam to safety. To protect wildlife on area properties, golf courses and neighborhoods throughout Florida, the FWC recently held "Wildlife Control Week" to educate the public and persuade residents to take steps to make their property wildlife-friendly. The FWC's website says, "Beginning in 2016, the FWC will issue non-compliance fines of up to $500 for repeat violations of our wildlife regulations. Fines will not be issued in cases of first-time violations. Unfortunately, when it comes to feral pigs
